Toledo Puerta del Sol

Saint martin bridge

Royal Monastery of San Juan

[Toledo Puerta del Sol]

Built in the late 14th century, a circular decoration was added to the horseshoe-shaped arch in the 16th century. It has a pattern of the sun and the moon, so it is called the Puerta del Sol y de la Luna. Since then it has been referred to as the Puerta del Sol. The sun and the moon are engraved with the seventh century archbishop of Toledo, San Ildefonso de Toledo (607-667), receiving the cross from the Virgin Mary. This is also what we have seen many times in the Cathedral. Obviously, this incident is of extraordinary significance to Toledo.

[Saint martin bridge]

Built in the 13th century, the bridgehead stands two defense towers in Gothic style. The San Juan Monastery, also a Gothic Catholic king, is a masterpiece of Juan Guas, built by the order of the Catholic King (los Reyes Católicos). This monastery is distinguished by its ornate carvings and the superb carving art on the cloisters.

[Royal Monastery of San Juan]

The Royal Monastery of San Juan, also known as "The Royal Monastery of Saint John", is a historic Catholic Franciscan monastery in Toledo, Spain, dedicated to Saint John, by King Ferdinand II and Castile of Aragon Queen Isabella I was built in 1477 to celebrate the birth of their son Prince Juan and to defeat the Portuguese king Alfonso V's army in the decisive Battle of Toro in 1476 for the merger of the two countries Paved the way [1]. The monastery was completed in 1504. It was chosen to build in Toledo because the city is located in the geographic center of Spain and is the capital of the Visigoth Kingdom.
